

What you can do if you are treated unfairly

In NSW there is a law that says people must be fair to you — when you go for a job at your work

at your school, college or university in shops, banks, hospitals, hotels, clubs, coffee shops and offices when you rent a house, flat or room

This law is called the Anti-Discrimination Act.

This law says people must not treat you unfairly, just because — you have a learning difficulty you have a disability

you are black or from a different country you are going to have a baby you are breastfeeding your baby you work and look after a family member you are old or young

you are a man or boy

you are a woman or a girl you are single or married or defacto you are gay or lesbian you are transgender (you are a man who has become a woman, or a woman who has become a man) you have HIV or AIDS

If people treat you unfairly, complain to the ADB. ADB stands for Anti-Discrimination Board.

The ADB can help you get a fair go.
